wrapped up closely in a dirty white cloth, and without moving his hands, is raising his head to suck the tragrant hookah. Half a dozen of his clients are attempting-to bargain with him, and sitting in a row on their hams in front, are all talking at once. Prondly conscious of his monopoly, he does not trouble himself to bandy idle words, but with all the patience of the Oriental, calmly waits till they have made up their minds to pay his price for whatever they may happen to want. In the opposite corner, an enormously obese old man is stretched out at full length sound asleep. This is the shopkeeper's venerable parent, who has retired from active life, and pensioned himself on his son. But we must peep into a tiny little place about the size of a rabbithatch, next door to the grain-merchant's shop. An aged gentleman, with huge, brass-rimmed spectacles, is fingering delicately with a wire forceps some hard, gray, little particles collected in an iron dish. Presently he picks out one, and applies it to a very small grindstone, the handle of which he turns with his great toe. This is a ieweler, as you can see by the little papers of green and yellow atones exposed on a board lying peside him; and he is putting faces on rough garnets which have been brought to him by some of the neighboring villagers. ## A Fable of Real Life.

Once upon a time (which means the present time) a crowing her had a fine brood of elsekens. Before the pin-feathers had started beneath their downy coats, the crowing hen mother was affored from her maternal daties by the thought that the race would be elevated if she should elevate berself upon the daughill alongside of the "cock-ofthe-walk." She said that whenever her rights were respected and she was permitted to craw every time the old cock crew, then would all hendom be perfect. No more should the mascalines mangle each others combs; no more should they dictate to the aspiring youngsters. She would reorganize barn-yard society on principles of equality and justice. She would no longer submit to the drudgery of batching the eggs and scratching for grabs. It was enough for her to lay the eggs. If there was any bossing to be done she was going to have her share of it. So she looked about her and tried to make a convect of a dilapidated rooster, whose tail feathers had departed with the glory of former days. Her efforts were successful, and they both hopped and cackled to the top of the great danghill greatrum of the barn-yard, and there they tuned their voices. in one long, shrift, cracked cools a should sale. This attracted the attention of the whole yard. The hens said "good luck-good luck;" the old cock shame, shame, shame for you-o-o-a!"

A good-natured, fat cupon, however, who could find no office to fill in the great burn-yard, and who was tired of being kept back from public life, resolved that this new era was a godsend to him. So be attended the conventions of the hen-crowists, and assisted in the general cuckle for reform. He knew that when the great cause succeeded be should be in among the first for lavors.

The reform did come, and the cocks and home gathered together upon the old rostram of liberty and political rights. After much congratulatory crowing, the dilapidated rooster and to the glori fied here:

"How are we going to manage about that sent of eggs and those prospective chuckens? I four they are cold already."

"Aye," said one supermunuated old hee, "what shall we do?"

"Why," said the bright black Spanish pullet, " Here's Kollins, the outlesiastic capon, he wants an office now in return for his services; let's about him to do the setting and the scratching. What else is he good for, I'd like to know? He would not do to stand here and do the crowing."

That was a bright idea, and forthwith the capon was elected unanimously. He was in cestacy at the announcement, and cheerfully went to week after pulling on his best pair of feether breaches. He had at last an office under the new order of thines, and the contemptuous cocks should souls usefulness no longer. In a short time he hatched out the eyes and was soon proudly stratching grabs for the chicks. How they delighted his eyes, those pretty, wee chicks! Finley was also delighted at the spectacle, and he said, "I will show this up to the world as a leason from nature." He took Kollins and the brood to Woodward's Gentlens, and there they are on exhibition. They excite much curiosity among the visitors, who are, like Durwin, studying the lower animals in order to solve the riddle of man. The great trouble, however, in their minds is as to how the law of " natural as lection" and the "aurvival of the fitnest" aball upply for the continuation of the race of enlightened and progressive capons. Alas, poor Kalillas

Woman's Wrr.—It is not generally the young lady who takes the lead in an elopement, but when she does the ransway is pretty sure to prove a success. Franklio, Toun, has a romantio couple whose course of true love did not ran very smoothly. So they planned a runaway scheme, intending to cross the State line and be married, and then return and beg the indignant father's mercy; the whole thing to be done between sumset and sunrise. Everything went all straight until they reached the depot, when a suggestion having been made that the trate father might overtake them, the bestegroom became nervous and wanted to go home. But his lody re-assured him: "I don't see now be can; I really don't," quoth she. "He lives three miles from here, and if he comes he will have to walk. He can't make the distance on foot before the arrival and departure of the train. I foresaw the danger of such a denouement fact night, and made my arrangements accordingly. I went to the stables, hid all the bridles, locked all the doors, and throw the key away. When I left home this mernion mother and father were micesp : I quietly turned the key upon them, and threw away the key too." That couple were married, and the man had better walk pretty straight with such a partner.
